

Caravaggio, The Calling of St Matthew (1599-1600)

The call of Levi (as St Matthew was then called) is a supremely gracious moment: one of the most dramatic instances of conversion in the Gospels, in which a tax collector recognises a new Lordship in the person of Jesus Christ, meets an irresistible summons to follow him, and leaves everything (including the failures and corruptions of his past life) to do so.

Against a monotonously plain, dark wall with a grubby, oilskin-covered window set high in it, the painting shows a table with various men seated around or stooping over it. The left hand end of the table is in shadow; the right hand end is nearer to the light, a light that comes from a source we can't see, but in slanting diagonally down from the top right hand corner of the picture becomes associated with the outstretched arm of Christ, whose pointing finger follows its line. Take especial note of that hand – I want to come back to it later. Christ stands at the extreme right of the picture, in the shadowy space beneath the shaft of light. He is very far from being centre stage, and is perhaps one of the last figures one's eye is drawn to. The light cuts across the picture making strong contrasts between the features, expressions and objects it highlights, and the dark ground of the painting as a whole.

Levi's face in particular is highlighted by the light as he turns towards it (assuming Levi is the bearded figure seated at the middle of the table, as seems most likely), while many of the other figures remain enveloped in shadow, especially the youth at the end of the table furthest from the light, with his head bowed and his fingers playing with coins – suggesting, perhaps, unredeemed humanity and the inability to respond to Christ. Other figures seem poised between light and darkness; they could go either way.

With its chiaroscuro effects and its concentration on an unidealised (however dramatic) depiction of its figures, this painting is very typical of Caravaggio's work – especially his later work. And here, as elsewhere, Caravaggio proves himself notably reluctant to depict grace or divine agency in obvious ways, unlike many of his artistic predecessors and a good number of his contemporaries. Divine agency in his paintings does not normally arrive in well-signposted manner by being somehow 'extra' to what the world already contains; we do not usually encounter it in the form of a 'supernatural' agent like an angel, or a celestial window onto heaven, or the visible transfiguration or ascent of saints. The discernment of the divine is thus not made an easy business in Caravaggio's hands. God's self-disclosure – his saving power and action in human life - does not take a form that can clearly be differentiated from other objects and actions, and pointed to in straightforward distinction from them. It has to be discerned in the irreducible interactions of people with each other and with their material environment.

What Caravaggio honours in his approach is something of which Christian theologians down the ages have been acutely aware: God is not just one more thing in the universe. He cannot be described in relation to and distinction from other creaturely realities as if he were one such reality himself. So to avoid showing us anything 'extra' than the normal run of creaturely realities, as Caravaggio avoids it, is to ensure that God is not distinguished from creatures in the way that creatures are distinguished from one another. So, for example, he leaves the shaft of light as itself – whilst opening a possibility that it may simultaneously mean more than itself.

That indistinguishability is, after all, what marked the calling of the boy Samuel all those ages before the calling of Matthew. What Samuel hears is wholly explicable as a human voice. Twice he interprets it as just that and no more. There is nothing obviously strange or supernatural about it. Moreover, there is no difference between the second and third call in what is made available to Samuel's merely bodily senses, and yet there is all the difference in his response. The difference is that before the third incidence of the call 'Samuel did not yet know the Lord, and the word of the Lord had not yet been revealed to him', whereas by the time of the third call it had. From the time of the third call onwards, there is a newly constituted servant of the Lord to hear the Lord speak. Samuel has been newly made.

Christians believe that because he is transcendent, incomprehensible and hidden, God can only be known when he makes himself known; God ensures his own knowability where nothing else can ensure it. So revelation is, essentially, divinely given and not humanly found.

And what is true of revelation in general is true of vocation in a very particular way. It is God who does it – but the medium in which it comes may be quite indistinguishable from ‘what is there anyway’. It may come through the human voices of friends, or pastors, or complete strangers. It may open up to us in very material circumstances, without a fanfare or a dazzling light; circumstances which look quite ordinary to others. People standing alongside will see the same basic stuff as the one being called, but not the way it has suddenly become transparent to him or to her, opening to new depths of meaning.

So let’s return to Levi in his tax office and ask what it was that God worked in him, and what God equipped him to discern.

The call narratives of the Gospels are, however you look at them, very hard to explain. It’s very hard to make them sound reasonable. What are we to make of the mysterious way in which Levi (like Andrew, Simon and the others before him) simply ‘fell in’ behind Jesus, leaving everything else behind? It is surely an extraordinary thing that men busy making a living, in the middle of a working day, should leave everything there and then and follow a stranger, without any clue about what adventures they are setting out on.

What we can say is that these are events which claimed the total person of those called, in an irresistible way. A bond between Jesus and his future followers was disclosed, confirmed and actualised in these encounters. In each case, we see much more unfolding than an intellectual decision that has been made after carefully weighing up the pros and cons. The call of Levi – like all the New Testament calls - is one of those moments in which everything clicks into place; in which the penny drops; in which to hesitate is to be lost.

Belief in God and discipleship of his Son Jesus Christ will always have such dimensions to them. It is of their essence that they are much more than reasonable – and you cannot ever put yourself in a position where you weigh up all the pros and cons and make a safe and prudent decision. There are inevitably all sorts of reductionist ways of explaining every instance of divine calling and human answering in Christian history. God, as we have noted, doesn’t appear with bells and whistles whenever a person becomes a disciple. It may seem that ‘calls’ are just examples of irrational behaviour that can be explained in human terms as pathologies or delusions – or, conversely (as argued by some modern New Testament scholars) as quite understandable responses to a previous familiarity with Jesus that the Gospels don’t tell us about. But to the eyes of faith, the Christian call is a divine work of transformation, by which people’s lives are radically and permanently changed. People who have never been able to accept their own self-worth learn to do so; people who have clung to material security let it all go; people who cannot forgive a particular thing – and who we might all agree would be unreasonable to forgive that thing – find they are not only able but want to forgive. The transformation of life effected by the divine call is as powerfully represented as anywhere else in the Bible by Levi’s simple act of leaving everything and following Jesus, and by the accompanying transformation of his name, to Matthew.

A reductionist looking at Caravaggio's painting might observe there is nothing in the shaft of light or the human figure per se to lead anyone to the firm conclusion that something miraculous is taking place, that Levi is receiving 'new sight'. To which we might answer: revelation cannot be depicted; divine reality cannot be reduced to the humanly imaginable. The painting as a painting can only show us a group of men, a dingy wall, a pointing finger, a shaft of light.

But then we might ask this: was the presence of an empirically real man (Jesus Christ) in a particular setting at a particular point in time merely incidental to the moment of revelation Levi underwent? Here, for Christians, the answer has to be 'no'. It is in the person of the incarnate one above all that the issue of God's 'appearance' becomes acute for Christian theology. To be sure, in apprehending the man Jesus, we do not as such and without further ado lay hold of God. But nor will the advent of revelation dispense with these facts, or obliterate their importance. We might say that the facts are made 'transparent' to something in excess of themselves.

The challenge to discern God's call in the world comes therefore in the form of a question about this person. The question is 'Who is this Jesus Christ?'. This question draws us along the way of the cross into dispossession with one who is the 'ultimacy' of our existence. We find him incognito, hidden in empirical history as empirical reality, "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Romans 8:3). He is the definitive revelation of God but only by allowing himself to be pushed out of the world onto the cross, in this way 'showing' us the God who is not an agent in competitive relation to other agents in the world – not just one who makes particular differences – but one who makes all the difference, in but not in addition to all the differences that there already are.

The shadowy figure of Christ in Caravaggio's painting can be read as this 'Who?'-provoking figure. His tangible presence is the condition for the 'Who?' being asked, but not the resolution of the question. The question will only be 'answered' by allowing, as Levi/Matthew did, some greater possibility to open up within the creaturely material in which he is humanly present. This greater possibility, if it is worthy of the description 'revelatory', will be a converting and a calling possibility, by which we are changed, and embark on the eternal 'process' of being opened from the midst of the penultimate to the fullness of the ultimate: to God's truth, and beauty, and goodness.

Levi the tax collector had the veil lifted – saw more than he had seen before – when he was asked to consider 'Who?'. The world of human transactions to which he was accustomed was opened up to a possibility in excess of itself. A world in which the only sort of embarrassment was embarrassment by debt suddenly became a world in which it was possible to be embarrassed by love – a love embodied in the person of Jesus. He saw what he thought was familiar with new eyes, as Jesus totally forgave his past, and asked him to come and work for a new world, and a new economy.

Now look again at that hand – the outstretched hand of Jesus Christ. For it echoes another famous hand – a hand Michelangelo painted on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, when he showed God's great act of creating the first man, Adam. What we are looking at in this painting by Caravaggio is a new Adam coming to life in the moment of Jesus's call – just as every call of every disciple is a birth into a new humanity, by the grace of God. Here, in this painting, a new creation springs to life at the hand of its creator. And having heard his call, Matthew the tax collector, for once, does not make any calculation; without a backward look he takes up Jesus' offer, leaves everything he has, and follows him.

Questions to reflect on

- The picture shows a Biblical event, painted as a contemporary scene by the artist Caravaggio (1571 – 1610). Are there messages or insights that you find this setting (a) highlights, or (b) hides?
- “Christ stands at the extreme right of the picture.... very far from being centre stage...” Are there any ways in which the outstretched right hand of Christ speaks to you of ‘calling’?
- How are the different characters in the painting responding to Christ? Which figure in the picture do you think is Levi (who is to become Matthew), and why?
- Matthew was called to leave what he had been doing. Can you think of examples of God calling (you or others) to leave a particular place, task or role?

COLLECT FOR ST. MATTHEW'S DAY

O almighty God, who by the blessed Son didst call Matthew from the receipt of custom to be an apostle and evangelist
grant us grace
to forsake all covetous desires and inordinate love of riches,
and to follow the same
thy Son Jesus Christ,
who liveth and reigneth with thee,
in the unity of the Holy Spirit,
one God, now and for ever.
Amen

METHODIST COVENANT PRAYER

I am no longer my own but yours.
Put me to what you will,
rank me with whom you will;
put me to doing, put me to suffering;
let me be employed for you
or laid aside for you,
exalted for you or brought low for you.
Let me be full,
let me be empty,
let me have all things,
let me have nothing.
I freely and wholeheartedly yield all things to your pleasure and disposal.
And now, glorious and blessed God,
Father, Son and Holy Spirit,
you are mine and I am yours.
So be it.
And the covenant made on earth,
let it be ratified in heaven.
Amen.

FROM FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL

Take my life, and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to thee
Take my moments and my days,
Let them flow in ceaseless praise.

Take my hands, and let them move
At the impulse of thy love.
Take my feet, and let them be Swift and purposeful for thee.

Take my voice, and let me sing
Always, only, for my King.
Take my intellect, and use
Every power as thou shalt choose.

Take my will, and make it thine:
It shall be no longer mine.
Take my heart; it is thine own:
It shall be thy royal throne.

Take my love; my Lord, I pour
At thy feet its treasure-store.
Take myself, and I will be Ever, only, all for thee.

FROM DAVID LIVINGSTONE

O Jesus,
fill me with you love now,
and I pray, accept me,
and us me a little for your glory.
O do, do, I pray,
accept me and my service,
and take all the glory.
Amen.
